RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE CONCEPT OF TRANSNATIONAL ORGANISED CRIME (CHALLENGES IN THE RULE-OF-LAW FIELD)

*By Mladen Vukčević**

SUMMARY: 1. Introduction. 2. Legal and Theoretical Views. – 3. Relevant Constitutional Provisions and Other Acts in National and International Law. – 4. Conventional Law. – 5- Concluding Remarks.

1. Introduction

Social phenomena research models are more difficult to be predicted than the ones in natural sciences and that is why these are often questioned in modern world. The above also stands for the study of human rights, the catalogue of which is continually expanding, especially internationalization hereof, which dates back to the end of the World War II. Since then, human rights are no longer a “matter of the state”, but quite the contrary – new rights are introduced on an international level, while existing ones are standardized along with establishment of new forms of protection hereof. After all, the history of humanity, when taking into account a long period of time, may be presented as a quadrilateral including the following: prescription, realization, violation and protection of human rights. All of this also applies to the respect for human rights in the fight against transnational organised crime, since, even in such circumstances, human rights must be respected, that is, which means that these must not be violated in the name of need for efficiency in the actions taken by judicial and police authorities.

The field of my legal interests, that is, the issue of human rights and transnational organised crime, shall be presented from three aspects, chosen from the three disciplines I teach (Introduction to Law, Constitutional Law and Human Rights). Therefore, this paper shall analyze the following three levels: legal and theoretical, constitutional and legal, and the level of the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which is increasingly being applied in our judicial practice.

2. Legal and Theoretical Views

In order to effectively exercise state power, various policies (legal, economic, educational, etc.) are implemented; in addition, various mechanisms and instruments are established for the purpose of improvement of effectiveness of the aforementioned policies. In the context of legal policy, the policy of crime combating is taking an increasingly important place, as well as the policy of combating transnational organised crime herein. The above stems from the fact that the compression of time and space in which we live produces new forms of criminality. The danger of violation of human rights justified by efficiency of the actions taken by state bodies is especially emphasized in the age of unexpected technological development and that is why the following often quoted legal question can be asked here - who will protect us from the guardians (“quis custodiet ipsos custodes”). All this sharpens the relationship between the following two values: the first one – suppression of crime and the second one – respect for human rights, despite the need to achieve the balance between these two for the good of citizens. The same stands for transnational organised crime which shows that erasing borders and facilitating the flow of people and ideas has to be considered through two aspects. Therefore, legal experts define the aforementioned relations more closely as follows: 1) positively (from the aspect of cooperation between states) and 2) negatively (from the aspect easier circulation of criminal activities)<sup>1</sup>.

The term transnational organised crime is a recent one, which is confirmed by the fact that in these regions we can only find it as a lexicon term in encyclopedia dated less than a decade ago.<sup>2</sup> However, the aforementioned circumstances did not result in precise definition of this type of crime. Thus, Lampe and Knickmayer argue that the above presents a considerable challenge for anyone dealing with this topic and refer to it as to a “confusing term” approached from many sources, the meaning of which is subject to constant changes and which, despite numerous attempts, has so far resisted any acceptable and attempt to be defined in a binding sense<sup>3</sup>.

The modalities of manifestation of transnational organised crime require establishment of new legal instruments and improvement of the existing ones, the appearance of which as well as the “underlying convention” may be associated with the period at the end of the last and beginning of this century. Thus, the basic source of international law in this regard is the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organised Crime, which was adopted in the form of a resolution of the United Nations General Assembly (55/25 of 15 November 2000). It was opened for signing at the conference in Palermo held in the period from 12 to 15 December 2000 and became effective on 29 September 2003. Along with the Convention, the following three protocols were adopted: the Protocol on Prevention, Suppression and Punishment of Trafficking in Human Beings, Especially Women and Children, the Protocol against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air and the Protocol against Illicit Manufacturing and Trafficking in Firearms, Parts of Firearms and Ammunition<sup>4</sup>. However, in the text of this convention, in art. 2, which prescribes the use of the term, the meaning of the term “transnational organised crime” is not fully and explicitly defined, which confirms the extent to which it remains indeterminate. In connection with the above, it should be pointed out that many international documents (multilateral and bilateral agreements, other types of agreements and memoranda, etc.) are not binding ones, which further complicates the fight against transnational crime.

The aforementioned view is confirmation of law development in modern age, while this example confirms that law development must be increasingly reflected in development of new legal institutes and legal procedures, as well as in innovative forms of police cooperation. The above is also necessary within this form of criminality since there are differences depending on the type of criminal acts in which it is manifested and the way it is organised in certain parts of the world. Therefore, it can be concluded that we are witnessing diversity, high level of planning, complexity and sophistication of this type of criminality in which large number of actors participate striving to illegally obtain significant funds and other material benefits.

The specificity of this type of criminality lies in a fact that it strives to influence the state functioning, trying to be part of it and manage social processes. In addition, it is characterized by constant adapting (“flexible criminal technology”) to the extent that it becomes resistant to various forms of social reaction<sup>5</sup>. Furthermore, it is characterized by infiltration into various areas of society (banks, companies, media, etc.) either individually or simultaneously in several areas. Therefore, for the fight against this form of criminality, we need new ways of legal and police thinking, as well as a continuous dialogue between legal science and practice in the context of law application (judicial, prosecutorial, police). However, for the purpose of affirmation of awareness in relation to this problem and the solution hereof, non-legal knowledge is also needed (informatics, economics, media, etc.). Therefore, complicated illegal puzzles require not only legal responses, which especially refers to “new democracies” and divided societies in politically unstable regions, such as the one Montenegro belongs to. For example, there is almost 10-15% of foreigners who live in Montenegro for various reasons – running away from the horrors of war, looking for a job or as a tourist, and among them there are those who see this circulation as an opportunity for illegal behaviour, including, of course, the citizens of Montenegro. That is where the following questions arises from – do we have the instruments, legal and other ones, to analyse aforementioned issues and react hereto effectively while protecting human rights simultaneously or we are moving towards or halting on our way towards the rule-of-law society. Unfortunately, European reports do not continually indicate a negative response to both questions, primarily at the political level.

The aforementioned indicates that the academic community, especially in relation to legal science, should have a dialogue on this topic, improve teaching plans, strengthen cooperation and research this type of crime from a multidisciplinary point of view. This type of view still does not have a proper place in legal textbooks, and, generally speaking, in literature. And it should always be emphasized that this topic is primarily the subject of criminal law, but also of a whole set of other legal disciplines from the field of international and domestic law. This is precisely why different disciplines are connected by the importance of doing justice and showing respect for human rights, i.e. having aspiration to hold monopoly over state power in a legitimate and legal way, which presents an essential state feature<sup>6</sup>.

3. Relevant Constitutional Provisions and Other Acts in National and International Law

The constitutional and legal aspect of this topic has its basis in the preamble and normative part of the Constitution of Montenegro<sup>7</sup>. In the preamble, it is prescribed that the citizens of Montenegro are determined live in a state where, among others, the basic and inseparable values: the respect for human rights and the rule of law. At the same time, the fight against transnational organised crime is an important segment of the process of building the rule-of-law principles, which is based on the respect for human rights.

In addition to the preamble, the normative part of the Constitution confirms the importance of human rights. arts. 1, 6 and 9 of the Constitution of Montenegro are important in the context of this topic and contained in the first part of the Constitution (Basic Provisions), whereas the central part of defining human rights and freedoms is presented in its second part (Human Rights and Freedoms), starting from art. 17 and concluding with art. 81. The aforementioned indicates that the content, number and diversity of human rights, together with other factors, confirm democratic character of the highest legal act of Montenegro.

Starting from the definition provided in the preamble, in art. 1 of the Constitution the rule of law is defined as a fundamental principle of state organization of Montenegro, whereas the guarantee of human rights and freedoms is integral part of the rule of law, together with other elements that constitute state organization of Montenegro (separation of powers, independence of judiciary, respect for constitutionality and legality, free elections, etc.). The foundation of human rights and freedoms is defined in art. 6 of the Constitution, which prescribes the principles of guarantee, inviolability and obligation to respect rights and freedoms, whereas the state of Montenegro is defined as their guarantor and protector.

Art. 9 of the Constitution stipulates that confirmed and published international treaties and generally accepted rules of international law present an integral part of the internal legal order, that these have primacy over national legislation as well as that these are directly applied “when regulating relations differently from national legislation”. This provision requires a brief overview. Namely, unlike other constitutions in which the primacy of international law is related to “the legal order”, our constitution maker, by using the (too narrow) term “national legislation” does not imply primacy of international law over the Constitution, by-laws and other acts of state authorities. Such a concept is further narrowed by the explanation that it exists only in cases in which the aforementioned sources of international law regulate relations “differently from national legislation”. For these reasons, the term “legislation” should be interpreted more broadly, in a material sense, and not in a strictly formal or procedural sense. Such reading of the constitutional norm shall expand the space for enforcement of international legal regulations in the part referring to transnational organised crime, whereas the cited provision should be adapted to European constitutional standards when and if the revision of the constitution happens.

The following provisions from the second part of the Constitution are of particular relevance for the topic of this paper: the provisions related to limitation and temporary limitation of human rights and freedoms (arts. 24 and 25), a set of constitutional rights related to guarantees in proceedings before the courts (arts. 29-38 of the Constitution), Articles that guarantee the right to privacy (art. 40 of the Constitution) and the right to the inviolability of the home (art. 41 of the Constitution), as well as the Article related to the protection of personal data (art. 43 of the Constitution).

This approach of our constitutional maker confirms the idea that “constitutionalism is a limitation of power in the interest of freedom” (K. Friedrich). Following the provisions of the European Convention and comparative constitutional solutions, our Constitution includes an obligation of cumulative fulfillment of the three conditions for the limitation of rights and freedoms (only by law, only if needed in a democratic society and only for the purpose for which these rights have been prescribed). The above is needed, for the purpose of avoiding arbitrariness, as well as inappropriate attempts to limit rights, since there is a thin line between limitation and violation of human rights.

In relation to the catalogue of human rights determined in the Constitution, here we are at the legal dividing line between the principles of criminal law science and academic hesitation on one side and police and a part of prosecutorial structures that prefer efficiency in acting (collection of evidence and adjudication). We are at the crossroads between the rights of those who are identified as the actors of transnational organised crime and the need of the state to deal with them more efficiently, having in mind the social danger of this type of crime, even at the cost of “urgency may be the source of a norm”. In that regard, there are also frequent political and media requests for the establishment of special courts, special investigative agencies which present a kind of “normative optimism”, i.e. the belief that it is enough to prescribe something in order to achieve it. Therefore, both sides (both science and practice) must be aware that abuses are possible.

For the normative aspect of this topic, in addition to the constitutional one, it is also important it's the legal definition hereof: from the Criminal Code, the Criminal Procedure Law, the Law on Mutual Legal Assistance, the Law on Confiscation of Assets Acquired through Criminal Activity, the Law on Data Confidentiality, the Law on Personal Data Protection, the Law on Border Control, the Law on Human Rights and Freedoms, the Law on the Protector of Human Rights and Freedoms and other laws.

In addition to the constitution and laws, agreements, protocols, memoranda and joint statement signed by the Government of Montenegro and the Ministry of Interior with the governments and ministries of interior of other countries present an important segment of normative regulation of transnational organised crime. The aforementioned documents are named differently although some of these include the names of criminal offenses from the part of criminal legislation referring to transnational organised crime, however, what all these have in common is the trait of being “transnational” and “organised” (in the context of crime). However, it is interesting that only one of these documents explicitly uses the phrase “transnational organised crime”<sup>8</sup>.

The existing normative framework relevant to this topic should be supported by the Strategy for combating transnational and organised crime, the adoption of which, together with the adoption of the corresponding Action Plan, is being postponed and still in its draft phase. Therefore, the process of adopting this strategy should be accelerated, especially since it has been defined as one of important tasks in the process of accession to the European Union and a step towards the operationalization of the European Union Strategy for combating organised crime (2021-2025).

4. Conventional Law

The relationship between respect for human rights and suppression of transnational organised crime cannot be fully understood if the analysis hereof does not include consideration of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its protocols. The following convention rights are of special importance for the aforementioned relationship: the right to liberty and security (art. 5), the right to a fair trial (art. 6), the right to privacy (art. 8) and the right to property (art. 1 of Protocol no 1). However, foregoing does not exhaust the list of relevant convention rights, starting from the fact that all of these are characterized by the features of substantive indivisibility and reciprocity.

Art. 5 of the Convention guarantees the right to liberty and security, i.e. the prohibition of deprivation of liberty except for the cases specified therein and in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law. This article also provides other guarantees for a person deprived of liberty (the right to be informed of the reasons for the arrest in his native language, the right of appeal to the decision on deprivation of liberty...). In addition, when persons who were participating in illegal actions that bear the traits of transnational organised crime are deprived of liberty, strict compliance with the aforementioned rights must be ensured. Otherwise, pursuant to paragraph 5 of this article, a person who is deprived of liberty contrary to the provisions hereof, is entitled to a complainable compensation.

With regard to art. 6 of the Convention, it should be taken into account that around 80% of the total number of cases from Montenegro which have been brought before the European Court of Human Rights are the cases related to the right to a fair trial. These are of great importance in the context of respect for human rights in the fight against transnational organised crime, since it must be taken into account that when deciding on criminal charges against a person, everyone has the right to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time before an independent and impartial court, according on the law. Especially “Ordinary courts” and the Constitutional Court have taken this convention right into account, in order to prevent violations of human rights and reduce the number of applications addressed to the Court in Strasbourg.

The cases related to respect for private and family life, correspondence and inviolability of home referred to in art. 8 of the Convention are important for the context of this paper. For example, the use of data from encrypted messaging applications (EncroChat, Sky ECC ...) and validity hereof in court proceedings present a central topic the fight against terrorism, organised crime, illicit trade in narcotics and psychotropic substances, illegal migration and other criminal offences, signed on 21 March 2015; Joint statement of intent between the Federal Ministry of Interior of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Ministry of Interior of Montenegro on prevention in the fight against transnational crime and capacity building, signed in 2015; Agreement between the Government of Montenegro and the Federal Council of Switzerland on police cooperation in the fight against crime, signed on 07 September 2016.

in numerous European judicial systems. This issue raises a number of questions, such as the following ones: the legal basis for “hacking” mentioned applications; whether these can be evidence or only operational data: at which stage of the proceedings these can have the power of evidence; whether these are valid if being taken individually or must be supported by other evidence, which includes the manner in which they were obtained, i.e. how the collection of evidence was reasoned; dilemmas about their reliability; the right to challenge the legality of evidence collection in the proceedings, etc. There is case law of the European Court of Human Rights related to the cases from the region (Dragojević v. Croatia (2015), Bašić v. Croatia (2016)) referring to the method of data obtaining, all of which open up new challenges and lead to the search for new answers. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the Convention does not contain rules on legality and illegality of evidence, however, it only assesses whether the use of evidence is contrary to its provisions. All this should be related to one of basic principles of interpretation of the Convention, according to which the Convention is a “living document” which is constantly being developed and adapted in accordance with ongoing changes in social circumstances.

Sensitivity is also visible in the application of art. 1 of Protocol 1 to the Convention, according to which every person is entitled to peaceful enjoyment of his or her possessions and that he or she shall not be deprived of his or her possessions except for situations in which it is centered around a public interest and in circumstances prescribed by law and general principles of international law. This provision becomes actualized in situations of temporary or permanent confiscation of property acquired by criminal activity, situations related to distribution of such property to family members, separation of such property from previously acquired property, as well as all other procedural problems arising from the above. It seems that media has the greatest interest herein, but, at the same time, it also has the greatest task in terms of disclosure, investigation and interest in those who adjudicate. In such cases, experiences of Italy are of great importance, as well as experiences from international cooperation on this topic, such as, for example, experience from French-Montenegrin seminar that has been recently organised with the aim of improving knowledge in the field of confiscation of property acquired through criminal activity. Confiscation activities must not be only in the focus of the media when it comes to the fight against this socially negative phenomenon. Otherwise, the practice of pompous announcement of property confiscation and then just silent abandonment of this issue shall be continued whereas the discrepancy between public expectations and efficient satisfaction of justice shall be increased.

5. Concluding Remarks

Taking into consideration the content of this paper, appropriate conclusions have been reached. These conclusions further point to possible directions, in terms of both the study of this topic and concrete activities aimed at the fight against organised crime, however, with respect for human rights of actors in this form of crime.

Having in mind the above, the following can be concluded:

- respect for human rights and activities aimed at suppression of transnational organised capital represent a complex relationship and a demanding legal and social task for all authorities involved in solving hereof. The same stands for the analysis of all aspects of this problem, which, within legal science, in addition to criminal law, include other legal disciplines, not only legal and theoretical ones, but also the ones from positive law;

- suppression of transnational organised crime and respect for human rights should be the subject of a special legal discipline, and other forms of acquisition, deepening and verification of legal knowledge – at faculties, in the Centre for Training in Judiciary and State Prosecution, in preparation programmes for taking professional and bar exams, as well as at various professional conferences;
- when considering revision of the Constitution, art. 9 of the Constitution should be upgraded along with ensuring (unconditional) primacy of international law;
- when it comes to laws, qualifications of criminal offenses related to transnational organised crime should be reviewed, as well as the penal policy related to these. First of all, this refers to the review of solutions provided in certain laws, especially the ones from the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure. The list of changes in legislation should also include the solutions provided in the Law on Personal Data Protection, the Law on the Protector of Human Rights and Freedoms of Montenegro, as well as in other acts regulating human rights;
- as for the ongoing year, it is necessary to adopt the Strategy of the Government of Montenegro for the fight against transnational and organised crime for the period 2023 – 2026;
- it is necessary to upgrade the curricula of the faculties of law, the faculties of security and the Police Academy in order to familiarize students with modern approaches to this topic and the influences that fall under the process of internationalization in the context of definition and protection of human rights;
- certain segments of this topic should be analyzed within master's theses and doctoral dissertations, as well as within various columns in legal journalism. In such a way, comprehensive legal analyzes shall produce wider resonance, by promoting awareness of importance of the fight against transnational organised crime;
- new forms of international judicial and police cooperation should be developed, as well as the instruments related to the fight against this form of crime.
